The Bombay Gazette.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1873.

The Bombay Argus has published a series of articles on Colonel Etheridge's narrative of the Inam Commission, but though the writer treats the subject at great length we fear that he has read the narrative with less care than it deserved, and in many respects it would appear as if he had looked through the book with his mind occupied by foregone conclusions which no evidence has been able to shake. The writer is probably one who has been influenced by the writings which were in years gone by put forward with confidence and a great show of sincerity as a defence of oppressed inamdars, but the utter worthlessness of which is proved by the narrative now published, and we cannot but regret that the Argus did not by a careful perusal of the narrative assure himself of the mistakes of the writers of those days, and of the misrepresentations which they were induced to lay before the public. As he has apparently not done this, and as it is of importance that such statements as are made by him should not pass uncorrected, we shall point out in what respects he has erred; in the hope that it will lead him to take a juster view of the work of the Commission which it was once the fashion to revile.

The writer commences fairly enough by saying that "it was very apparent that the Government had strong motives for taking action "in the matter of land and cash alienations of the "public revenue," but he should not have said that "the primary object which the Government "had in view was to assess those lands the revenues "from which had been alienated as inam grants "under the Peishwa's Government." He ought to have started with the admission that Government was honestly inclined and intended to pursue its enquiries fairly and justly. If this be not admitted, we need try to say nothing in favour of the Inam Commission, but if it is admitted, of course the chief object could only have been the confirmation and security of good titles, and the assessment of lands held upon bad titles a secondary consideration. Nor is it quite correct to designate the lands assessed as "Inam grants "under the Peishwa's Government," because "inam grants" for the most part were respected. It was chiefly surreptitious acquisitions of land in spite of the Paramount Power that were finally assessed. The Argus proceeds to call such acquisitions of land "real property" and claims for it "the rights of inheritance," and further, the "disposal of it by adoption." He says it would be called real property in England; but would Government or Crown lands improperly acquired in spite of the authorities, in collusion with understrappears, be regarded as "real property?" and would the Law Courts concede to it the "rights of inheritance," &c.? As to rights of adoption, they were never allowed under any Native Government whatsoever in respect to land or any description of property which derived its origin from the State. Adoption, even if a sacred necessity, was purely a domestic affair and exclusively of domestic validity, and all the rights of religion, if any, centred in it as such. If a man thought adoption a sacred duty, there was no bar to his adopting. It was no concern of Government till they were asked to let the adopted son succeed to Government property as well as to the family property. And the position as to the "rights of inheritance" cannot be upheld on the plea that the Government sanction was never withheld, because as a matter of fact the Peishwa withheld his sanction much more often than not. In fact, the allowing of adoption with a view to the perpetuation of inheritance of State property which would otherwise lapse was an event of rare occurrence, and was sanctioned only either in the case of a great family, or of sufficient pecuniary equivalent being given, or perhaps on some State occasion which demanded the concession. Universal sanction for the perpetuation of inheritance of all lands, such as the Argus would hint at, was not the practice of any Native Government. And while we are touching on this point, we may say that Mr. Elphinstone seems to have doubted that adoption was looked upon as a sacred necessity in any respect, for speaking of the Peishwa's practice, he says—"It is universally "admitted that in case of any sort of property "emanating from Government, as wuttuns, "inams, and everything not personal, the previous consent of Government to the adoption is "indispensable to the succession of the adopted "son. The plea of religious obligation to "adopt a son has been proved to be entirely "nugatory by several instances here in which "persons, after having most anxiously sought "permission to adopt a son, have declined it on "being informed that the adopted son could not "succeed to their jagheer."

The Argus goes on to say that the Government neglected to interfere in the matter of alienations of land from 1818 to 1843, but a more intimate knowledge of the facts would have prevented his falling into such an error. Mr. Elphinstone, in 1819, framed rules and proclaimed that enquiry would begin, and it did begin, so that it is not the case that there were thirty-four years of undisputed possession. This is all stated in Colonel Etheridge's narrative, and should not have escaped the notice of the writer in the Argus. Mr. Elphinstone warned all that extensive enquiry would be instituted, and Regulation XVII. of 1827, as explained in the narrative, clearly shows that Mr. Elphinstone did not look upon inam lands as private property, to be disposed of as the owner (or more properly speaking, the holder) pleased. And Mr. Elphinstone after all was not divinely inspired; his utterances in regard to this are only of force so far as they correctly interpret the Peishwa's practice, and if at any time Mr. Elphinstone did think that inam land was private property (which we doubt) he was not in accordance with the Peishwa's duftur's evidence, and he was right to change his opinion when passing Regulation XVII. of 1827 into law, which is in accordance with the Peishwa's duftur. The Argus also argues that because one Imperial Power grants by Royal firman territory to another, specifying it to be a permanent grant, therefore all surreptitious acquisitions of land, with no authoritative specification of tenure, are to be regarded as equally
